

HIGH-COST SLIDES

Scenario 1

The coach is meeting with their client for an initial visit. The appointment ran over, and the coach left in a hurry to go to their next client appointment. When the coach was completing their visit documentation, they realized a goal was never completed with their client. As a result, the coach randomly documented a goal based on the information provided by the client during the visit.

Scenario 2

The coach is meeting with their client who shares they are having problems paying their utilities, attempting to enroll in GED classes and more. The client briefly mentioned not having enough to eat, but minimized this issue in an effort to focus the conversation on GED programs instead. Because the coach already had enough work issues to deal with and the client didn't seem to be too concerned about the lack of food, the coach didn't share any food resources.

Scenario 3

The coach is meeting with a client who admits she is having difficulty with goal setting because she is very overwhelmed in her life. The client states her mental health has not been the greatest and she would like a counselor but is not sure about any available resources she can utilize. She admits struggling to find childcare and it's stressing her out. The coach gives the client resources for daycares, believing the client's problem is mainly stress related due to not having stable childcare for her children.
